Be careful when you use Photoshop to manipulate the layers of an image. If you accidentally select a layer rather than the intended object, then you can easily lose control of the original image and have the wrong layer selected. Creating Multilayered Images Photoshop offers a great tool for creating multilayered images. You can make several layers in an image in the same way that you'd make a page in a magazine. For example, you could make a design for a page with a set of objects, such as a headline, a logo, and a graphic, that you'll place on one layer. You could create another layer for the background and one more for a watermark, text, or a logo. To create a layered file, follow these steps: 1. Make sure that the document is opened in Photoshop and that all layers are visible (see Figure 15-2). 2. Choose Edit⇒Layers⇒New. The dialog box for New Layer (see Figure 15-3) appears, where you can enter the name of the new layer. If you choose the Layers from an existing image option, Photoshop places the file (which you can easily select) in the layers panel in Photoshop. If you select New Layer from the History or Browser panel, the new layer is created in a new document and displayed in the History or Browser panel (see Chapter 12 for information about working in the browser). If you choose New Layer from the Layers panel, you see the dialog box shown in Figure 15-4. You may be prompted to select an existing layer to copy from if you have no layers created. You can select an existing image file to import into the new document by selecting the Select Files option in the Browser panel, which automatically creates a new document and places the file in the layers panel (if necessary). 3. Choose the type of layer you want from the list in the Layers panel. Photoshop remembers the settings of each layer you create and preserves the individual settings for each layer. The settings include the blending mode, the opacity, the color, the adjustment settings, the sort order, and the visibility of the layer. If you select Clone Layer and a new image file is being created, Photoshop cloned the original layer and adds the new layer to the end of the list. To make this new layer active (visible), you need to select it and enable it (by toggling on

Sunday, 7 April 2012 A Bit of TLC Have you ever thought of doing so much for your loved ones that you end up spoiling them? I guess that's what happened to me. I love my family, the one who is always ready to help, whenever I want to hear some advice or guidance on anything. And they are so appreciative and there's always someone to open their arms in welcoming. But of course, with time, I stopped hearing all the advices and guidance they offered. They always asked how my family was doing, if there's something that they can do for me to improve my relationship with them, but I always accepted their advice and turned a deaf ear to everything. To be honest, I always thought I know better on every aspect and I always feel that I have the answers on everything. And I guess that's the difference between them and I, because, while they are very determined to help other, I end up finding reasons to why I can't do something for myself. I met the love of my life when I was still a teenager. He became a great friend of mine, and today, it's ten years later. I guess I've become spoiled because of him. At first, I wanted the best of everything for him, and of course, he would get it. He's the first person I ever wanted to help, while I am the one who doesn't like asking for help. I felt like I should make him be the one to get help from me, and he would consider it as a nice gesture. It's not that I don't want to help him, I just don't want to stop him. I know it's really selfish of me, especially now that I think about it. I am the one who need his help right now, and still, I don't want to let him get a hold of me. I may not know where I need him most, but I guess that's what's really cruel in all this. I know that he needs my help, but I don't want to give it to him. I wish I could just take the advice I heard when I was young, especially when it comes to relationships. I wish I could just tell him what I think, without worrying about my pride or

Q: Monitoring a remote Linux machine, catching an unhandled exception I want to monitor a remote Linux server that doesn't allow you to enable software to log unhandled exceptions. Is it possible to somehow catch an unhandled exception and send out an email of it or something similar? I am writing an application that does a lot of CPU intensive tasks (like a loop doing 2^n times 7^n operations in order to bruteforce large passwords). Of course there are a lot of other application which run on it, which all run fine without an error. I tried to write to the standard output stream of the process (output is redirected to a file so it doesn't cause a problem) and the writing, but the program just keeps running like everything is fine, no special handling for a unhandled exception. If I run the script from the command line, it works. I also tried to run the app from the background with & and looking for a termination signal (SIGTERM or SIGKILL), but nothing is done (the script does not exit, it just keeps running). I tried wrapping the script in a test program, which contains a unhandled exception, but that didn't work either (the test program runs fine, but the script doesn't). A: I'm afraid you can't (not completely) from within the script. But the concept is simple. Enable 'SIGQUIT' and 'SIGUSR1' on the remote machine. Log actions and exceptions. Read log and when something happens, send email. See: A: You could install a terminal emulator on the remote machine, and have it log all exits to a file; then at your remote machine, you could pull that file, and upon log-in and exit, send yourself an email. That way, you'll know when things actually happen. A: If you can get root access on the system: sudo dmesg | grep OOPS If you have to run in user space: Write a wrapper function for signal handlers. Check
