The installation process is highly easy as you don't have to. If successful, the project would be the first time the "triangle" was drawn in the state, meaning all three counties would be included, not just one, as they have been for the last three years. But that hasn't stopped some of them from questioning whether the change makes sense. "I'm very curious why it would go to a conference and say that this is what we want the state of North Carolina to look like," said Lauren Asbury, a spokeswoman for the Winston-Salem/Forsyth County Schools. "We do not believe that this will be conducive to education," said Heather Shivers of the Wake County school system. "I think it's a complete waste of time and money," said Bill Tate, a school board member in Johnston County. "It sounds like it's another special-interest grab at a certain organization." An added bonus to the

Florence Community Schools is that, since the district operates more elementary schools than most, the schools it is sending to the conference will not be competing with other schools. William Umphrey, who will chair the Florence conference, said no schools in Johnston County have done anything in a similar way, and the county commissioner who drafted the resolution said district records indicate Florence had little interest in attending. "Our understanding is that was one of the driving forces behind it," said Umphrey, whose district board has allowed him to lead the initiative. "Nobody in the district was pushing for it." Umphrey said he hopes the county might be included in the Florence conference "in the future," but that once Florence is gone, Wake will be the only district sending students to the annual conference, which is called "Soaring Eagles," Wake will have to pay $5,000 for the services of the Florence district 6d1f23a050
