The SANS offers three new courses: the SANS-GC504 Network Security Operations Security. A few days ago I posted a guest article by Paula Deen. In the article, Paula and I discussed our lives and careers. But in the course of our conversation, she told me about a conversation she'd had with her late father years ago, about one of his friends who he said was a "thieving sonofabitch." The friend was a millionaire, one of "we," the friends to whom Paula belongs. "I think the millionaire's son was a crook," Paula said. Her father's friend and fellow friend of Paula's family was the only son of a very wealthy family. His father died when he was a child, and both his parents were from the South. They were very nice people — kind and generous. But those of us who knew the child of this family, even though he was a grown man, still used to refer to him as "the bad boy." The bad boy of the family. One day, the bad boy just up and went away. For several years, he took a position with a large organization that was one of the largest employers in the country and lived in the home of a friend of his parents' who was very wealthy. Then he turned up at the house where Paula lived with her mother and stepfather. When she asked her mother, she said, "Oh, I'm sure it was just a brief, one-day fling. He's gone now, gone back home." My friend: "But why? Why didn't he call or come back?" My friend was so outraged that someone could so casually treat a friendship with her family as a casual sexual adventure that she felt like laughing in the face of the dismissive response. She turned her anger to her mother, who seemed to give it some thought. At last she said, "Because, my daughter, he 6d1f23a050
